Want to raise a happy, healthy, well-behaved kid? Want to live in a home where discipline becomes unnecessary? The secret is to create a closer connection with your child. It isn't enough that we tell our children we love them. Being present just means paying attention. Like a marriage or a friendship, your relationship with your child needs positive attention to thrive. Attention = Love. Like your garden, your car, or your work, what you attend to flourishes. And, of course, that kind of attentiveness takes time. You can multi-task at it while you're making dinner, but the secret of a great relationship is some focused time every day attending only to that child. "This is all too vague for me. Relationship Development Intervention with Children, Adolescents and Adults by Steven E. Gutstein Paperback $34.95. In Stock. Ships from and sold by Amazon.com. The authors suggest that children with autism do not develop friendships just by being among peers, but need strategies and activities to develop the foundations of social referencing, regulation of their own behaviour, and practice in becoming a social partner. The activities focus on teaching the child how to see others as real people, develop a curiosity for social interaction, become a team member, and adapt in social settings. Excellent book which covers the rdi therapeutic approach for working with persons with asd. contains many great activities to help kids with asd connect. Read more. Helpful. By contrast, children from enmeshed home environments entered school with no more disciplinary problems or depression and withdrawal than their peers from cohesive families. But as children from both enmeshed and disengaged homes continued in school they began to suffer higher levels of anxiety and feelings of loneliness and alienation from peers and teachers. It is important to distinguish between primary relationships between generations (e.g., within family and/or locality) and structural relations between generational segments. Historically, childhood has developed as a result of changing economic circumstances and has experienced a growing distance to other generational segments.
