‘Beware, I pray you, of any religion that merely springs from the carnal desire of enjoyment of Heaven. Both the terrors of hell and the joys of Heaven are insufficient to make the soul seek the Saviour truly. There must be a sense of sin and a desire after holiness, because, after all, the essence of hell is sin, and the essence of Heaven is holiness, and you are not likely to go to God merely because of the external hell or Heaven. KEY WORDS: law, leadership, lesser of two evils, Niccolò Machiavelli, power, The Prince. Just as man is the best of animals when perfected, when separated from law (λόγου) and justice (δίκης) he is the worst beast. Aristotle, Politics1. Machiavelli, The Prince2. Of all the thinkers who have written on the complications leaders face, perhaps none has had more of a talent for direct and blunt talk than Niccolò Machiavelli (1469-1527). His words are especially pointed in his timeless classic The Prince (1532/1988).
